SCHOOL MELANGE,

Over a month of our school work is done, but in some classes not so well done as it should have been from the fact that the pupils were not supplied with the necessary books. Why this must occur every year is a mystery, but it does. Nearly an entire month is lost in many of our classes on account of a lack of books. The remedy for all this is free text books. Attention has been called to this quite a number of times in these articles, and will be again and again, until our board of education moves in the matter or our legislature passes a law to that effect that will apply to Wheeling as well as to other parts of the state. All the leading cities of the United States now have free text books, either wholly or in part, and why cannot we join the procession as it moves along and not be everlastingly bringing up the rear in all questions of reform? But when we do move we move surely and some bright day we limb ye systematic instrucof the United States now have free text books, either wholly or in part, and why cannot we join the procession as it moves along and not be everlastingly bringing up the rear in all questions of reform? But when we do move we move surely and some bright day we will have free text books, and it will be a bright day for our schools, and it will be a bright day for the tax-payers, as well, for several hundred dollars will be saved yearly to the people.

Some one asked the writer, "what is fore answering the question, we would say that the text book is a much abussay that the text book is a much abuse one. Mr. Jones is eighty-seven years old, and he yet retains good health, with the pleasing prospect of its continuance. Mrs. Jones is seventy-six years old, and also in splendid health. They were married in England, coming to this city in 1852, at the time of the Intelligencer's foundation. Mr. Jones has been a subscriber through all these years, and the Intelligencer extends its felicitations to him and his estimable wife.

It is very gratifying to all friends of education to know that our university begins this year with such bright pros pecis. Over 700 students are in attendance at the start. That the enrollment during the year will reach 1,000 or more is now almost an assured fact. Now, if those who are finding much fault with the management of the university will just be as zealous for its success as they seem to be anxious to hinder its progress, we will soon have an institution of which we may well be proud. In saying this the writer takes no sides in the controversy, but as a friend of education he stands for the right. If the management of the university is not what it ought to be let all friends of education use their best endeavors to right what is wrong. Let this be done in a spirit of fairness to all concerned, and not attempt to belittle by communications, some of which smack of the "smart" style with nothing tangible in pects. It has taken a long while to bring our highest school to what it now is, but it will take but a short time to destroy it, if its friends see fit to become its enemies All these things are said in a spirit of kindness and by one who knew of the work of the university long before some of its enemies of the present management were old enough to realize its benefits to the state if indeed they yet appreciate what it has done and is doing for it. Gentlemen sducation, we owe it to the cause of education to let up in this matter and all lend a helping hand to induce our boys and girls to yearly crowd the halls of our university for the one purpose of fitting themselves for becoming true men and true women.

three or four good banjo, mandolin and guitar clubs, which were in frequent demand at concerts and other form of entertainments. These organizations were conducted on a proper basis, but the wave of interest in the sweet-toned string instruments which had been on for a couple of years ebbed to low tide in Wheeling three years ago, and the Waldo Quartette, known as the Ariciub in the period spoken of, is the sole remainder. The Premier and Imperials were two others, and the former had the widest reputation—in fact, it was the premier in every sense. It was the original banjo club here and it reached a high standard of excellence. It disbanded on the removal to Philadelphia of its mainspring, Fred C. Meyer, now engaged in the manufacture of mandolins and guitars in the Quaker City. The other members were Louis F. Schrader, E. F. Schofield. George Wells, Will F. Every now and again three or four overs of good literature group them selves together in a cosy room and mutually exchange the beauties gleaned from favorite authors, and on such times the hurry and noise of the street outside are forgotten. It is on these occasions that the hungry mind turns to a literary society, and its absence in a city the size of Wheeling looms up on the sea of reflection. In the humble villages scattered all over the highlands of West Virginia may be found literary societies which prove a source of delightful and instructive entertainment, and the wonder is that the kindred spirits are not banded to gether in this city likewise. A literary society, devoid of tight-laced exclusiveness, would fill a painful void. The topics for discussion at the weekly or monthly meeting need not be confined to the gems in poetry or prose. The latest in science, economics and industrial developments would help round a happy and practical combination. The initiative taken, the Wheeling society would soon have a large membership, and the proper time to organize it would be rish I now, with the approach of cold tually exchange the beauties gleaned

The old gentleman manifested no desire to vacate the parlor, much to the sorrow of an Island maiden and her sire to vacate the parior, much to the sorrow of an Island maiden and her best young man, who for an hour had the gas in the grate turned up to a high notch in hopes of the room becoming too warm for him, since he had complained of the heat on entering the room. Ever and anon the sedate strend graneed at the thermometer on the door. He fldgeted uncomfortably from the heat while trying to read his paper, yet remained in his chair, a stumbling block to the sweet words two hearts wished to exchange. A thought struck the apple of his eye. She saw her father walk over to the thermometer. She followed instantly with the lamp in her hand. While he graded at the mercury she held the lamp directly beneath, and her father's astonished eyes saw the festive mercury mount at the lamp's bidding. But he didn't stop to discover why. A jump to 90 degrees in a minute was more than he could stand and he vacated the parior forthwith. Then the gas in the grate was turned lower, likewise the lamp, and two hearts beat as one until the finale at the hald door.
